Indigenous art and craft

Thinking of buying Indigenous art?

If you are looking at purchasing Indigenous art and craft, make sure you are getting the real deal.

Whether it be a souvenir or a collector's piece, know what to look for and ask the right questions to get what you pay for.

There are a few simple steps you can take to help protect yourself and ensure that you are buying genuine Indigenous art.

Protect yourself—what to look for and what to ask

- Ask the seller:
 - the name of the artist and their language group or homelands
 - the title of the work, and when and where it was created
 - the details of any story it tells or other cultural information.
- Read the label carefully. 'Aboriginal style' or 'Indigenous style' does not necessarily mean the item has been produced by an Indigenous person.
- A photo of an Indigenous person holding a painting, or even sitting beside a work in progress, does not guarantee that the artwork was created by that person.
- Ask whether the artwork was created by one artist or collaboratively. If there are more than one artists, who are they?
- Does the seller have a good reputation either in the art industry generally or in the Indigenous art industry?
- Consider whether the price seems fair and reasonable for the size and quality of the artwork and the reputation of the artist.

- Is the seller a member of a reputable industry association or a signatory to any industry code of practice?
- Be extra careful that you know what you are buying if you are shopping online or from a catalogue.

Although not a guarantee, certificates of authenticity do provide a written record of what you have been told you are buying, which may assist at a later stage in establishing whether you have been misled.
